"Can I take it home?" asked a judge seizing the book on Japanese artist Yayoi Kusama. This award has judges poring over prints, books or art catalogues with the very highest levels of origination and print. With Kusama's work on show at the Victoria Miro gallery, Push Print could compare the work alongside proofs. Metallic paper was used and images were retouched to perfection. But the best details were the subtle ones: looking at the side of the book reveals a fine sliver of black and white. This publication was no one-off, having printed images for photographer Giles Duley before, the London printer had to balance new photos with old, but passing proofs was a problem: Duley was in Greece covering the refugee crisis so Push Print had to rely on its expertise. Duley was, according to the award entry, "over the moon", as should Push Print be with its award.

"Lovely quality throughout with all the entries brilliantly showcasing the use of creative papers," said judges of the Sussex printer with a repeat of last year's highly commended gong. The judges were wowed by the sheer complexity of ink, paper and binding required on the submission that demonstrated the Pureprint team's prowess at pulling the most complex of projects together.
